So now we know Uriuri and what he stands for. Now it's time to learn the origins of his strange name. うり "Uri" comes from うりぼう "Urizou" or boar piglet. Saying it twice makes it cute and that's how you name a new character. I wonder how many sleepless nights Kyoko endured to come up with that name? Well, after the kids and the pig, I can't imagine we'll be getting more new characters any time soon.

Or will we...?

What we know as karate today comes from the efforts of Mr Gichin Funakoshi (船越 義珍). Originally from Okinawa, to-de (唐手), later changed to karate, was a self-defense art that used no weapons. There were three popular styles of karate: Naha-te, Shuri-te and Tomari-te; named for city of origin. In time, the Naha and Tomari styles merged to form shorei ryu and Shuri style gave rise to shorin ryu. Now, Mr Funakoshi, master of both shorei ryu and shorin ryu, starts on his path to karate superstardom. He performed for Crown Prince Hirohito in 1921, played a large role in changing the karate name (from 唐手 to the modern 空手) in 1929, and built his own school in 1939 that came to be known as Shotokan, after his poet pen name. Shotokan karate is world-famous and is generally what people mean when they think of karate, even if they don't know the name.

Anyway, about that new character:

Cute, huh?

By the way, 唐手 means something like "China-hand" because of its Chinese origin; and 空手 means "empty-hand" for obvious reasons.

Words

Hope you all enjoyed the second volume and the intense drama that came with it. Feelings were hurt but the power of friendship prevailed once again. Old bonds were strengthened and new bonds were born. Maybe someday their mutual respect will be on par with these folks.
